Executive Summary

The purpose of this manual is to provide general guidance on the classification of activities as trading. This manual sets out guidance on what constitutes trading and includes information from a body of previously decided cases which will assist taxpayers and Revenue Divisions.

1. General

Section 21 of the Taxes Consolidation Act 1997 (TCA 1997) sets the general rate of corporation tax at 12.5 %. That rate applies (subject to certain exceptions set out in Section 21A) to trading income of companies taxed under Case I of Schedule D.

Section 3(1) TCA 1997 describes “trade” as including “every trade, manufacture, adventure or concern in the nature of trade”. As the word “trade” is not specifically defined, the term takes on the generally accepted meaning.

Guidance as to what constitutes “trading” is available from case law and from a set of rules known as the Badges of Trade. The Badges of Trade were originally set out in the 1954 report of the UK Royal Commission on Taxation (See appendix A for details of the Badges of Trade).

2. Guidance on trading issues

Whether or not, in any situation, a trade is being carried on is determined by an examination of the facts of the particular case and by interpreting those facts in the context of the badges of trade and of case law in so far as it applies. There is an infinite variety of possible factual circumstances so that no fixed formula can be applied to determine whether or not an activity can be classed as “trading”. In the vast majority of cases there will be no doubt about whether the activities constitute trading.

However, a number of issues have emerged from cases since the introduction of the 12.5% rate and these are set out below:

2.1 Trading Presupposes Activity

Trading presupposes that the company concerned is carrying on business activities from which its income derives. The activities will vary depending on the nature of the trade and will require people with the skill and authority necessary to carry them out. Outsourcing of activities would not necessarily prevent a company’s income being taxed as trading income. Where outsourcing is involved the company must provide details of how it conducts, manages and controls the outsourced part of its business.

2.2 Distinction between Trading and Investment

Certain types of activity are more likely to be in the nature of an investment rather than a trade. In general, where a company owns an asset and the mere ownership of that asset produces an income, the company's income from this asset will not be trading income. Routine ancillary services such as invoicing or accounting would not change the nature of the income to trading income where it is primarily generated by the ownership of the asset. The ancillary activities merely involve the management of the income flow from the investment.

The activities of companies whose sole activity is the management and exploitation of intellectual property can sometimes be difficult to evaluate in terms of whether there is a trade being conducted. The nature of the property of such companies varies widely and can include brand names, patents, software, process formulations and know-how. Because intellectual property is an asset the mere ownership of which yields an income, there are significant hurdles to be cleared before the income of a company from licensing such property could be regarded as trading income.

The case of Noddy Subsidiary Rights Company Ltd v CIR 1966 [43 TC 458] (the Noddy case) is often quoted as an authority in favour of the proposition that the mere ownership of an asset and receipt of royalties can be a trade. However, in that case there was evidence of a high degree of activity associated with trying to promote the brand, seeking out and evaluating licensees and of dealing with third parties.

At one end of the scale, a company whose only activity is the licensing of the rights to intellectual property, and the on-licensing of such rights, is unlikely to be regarded as trading. The property licensed to it is not developed in any way. The company is merely a conduit through which the rights to the intellectual property pass. At the other end of the scale, income of a company that actually creates the intellectual property by engaging in R & D, continues to develop it and bears the costs and the associated risks and actively promotes and licenses out the rights for its use to multiple third parties would invariably be regarded as trading income.

The Noddy case concerned the exploitation by a company of a fictional character from a series of children's books. The company's income was derived from the granting of licences to use the pictorial representation of the character. These licences were granted to manufacturers of goods in return for the payment of royalties.

It was held in this case that it is generally possible for the granting of licences on royalty terms to be in the nature of a trade when the facts and circumstances supported such treatment.

"...where a person owns an item of property and grants licences under it, those activities may or may not, according to the particular circumstances, amount to a trade... where you have this position, that a person owns an asset of any kind, whether physical or not, and grants licences under it, the activities which he carries on in connection with the grant of those licences may amount to a trade and then Case I of Schedule D applies. On the other hand, at the other end of the scale, the activities may amount to the mere holding of an investment, so that the receipt of income is in the nature of pure income profit...”

Although the appellant:

- referred to the company’s objects clause (which empowered the company to carry on the business of exploiting and profiting from character) and
- put forward 16 arguments in support of the contention that the activity was trading in nature no singular circumstance was identified as particularly determinative as to whether or not an activity is within the nature of a trade.

In reaching the conclusion that the activities amounted to a trade in this specific case, the following points were relevant:

- the objects clause in the memorandum of association
- the time spent by the representative in managing the Company’s affairs,
- the fact that the representative:
 - actively sought out customers,
 - exercised, when managing the licences, skill and labour of a continuous and variegated kind.

It was recognised that the company did not have a separate office or staff and this was the only respect in which the activities did not contain the common elements of a trade. However, this circumstance in itself was not enough to prevent the activities from amounting to a trade.

The activities of the company in the Noddy case provide an indication of the level of activities required to constitute the carrying on of a trade. It may be useful to consider the principles outlined in the Noddy case and their application to the facts in other cases being evaluated to determine whether the activities amount to trading or are in the nature of investments. Cases should be examined on their own particular facts and circumstances and consideration should also be given to other case law, and the Badges of Trade.

Not all of the income of a trading company will necessarily be classified as trading income. In this regard Revenue published a Guidance Note: – Deposit Interest – Whether a Trading Receipt, this is now to be found in Tax and Duty Manual (TDM) Part 02-02-07.

2.3 Group Structures

Where a company seeking trading status is a member of a group and another group company or companies have an involvement in the conduct of the particular trade, Revenue would need to be satisfied as to the role of the various companies. In particular, the company seeking trading status in respect of an activity must establish that it carries on sufficient activity to be trading. Evidence in relation to the levels of authority and responsibility across the group will clarify where the real decision-making lies, and information in relation to the deployment of assets and personnel will clarify the business activities carried on by each company. An explanation of the commercial reasoning and the business objectives behind a particular group structure will be helpful in understanding the underlying strategic business purpose and the value added by the applicant company.

3. Advance opinions

In general, the Revenue Technical Service do not offer an opinion in advance of a transaction. Furthermore, in the vast majority of cases there will be no doubt about whether activities would constitute trading.

However, for certain complex issues arising on corporate restructurings or new inward investment projects where clarity is required on whether a particular activity constitutes the “carrying on of a trade” opinions may be sought.

Appendix B provides examples of cases where an opinion was provided on whether an activity was accepted as constituting trading. All of these opinions were based on the specific information provided in each particular case.

The procedures set out in the Revenue Technical Service Guidelines in TDM Part 37-00-00a should be followed and the full details of the facts and circumstances should be set out by practitioners.

A request for an opinion should always include a description of the proposed activity and contain all the information necessary to enable Revenue to reach a conclusion in relation to the issues outlined above. Any areas of doubt should be highlighted and reasons given as to why it is considered that trading status would be appropriate in the circumstances. In particular, the following details should be given:

- Outline of the trade to be carried on. If there is potential for viewing these activities as investments, explain why it is considered that trading should apply.
- The main activities involved in the conduct of the trade and the functions undertaken at senior level to manage the trade.
- The number of people at management level, their skills and authority level.
- The number and skill level of the other people who will carry out the functions involved in the conduct of the trade.
- In relation to a group structure that might give rise to the concerns outlined above, provide the information set out in that paragraph.

It should be noted that, as set out in TDM Part 37-00-40, in the case of new foreign direct investment projects, where the taxpayer concerned does not have an Irish tax registration, applications for opinions in advance of establishment in Ireland should be addressed to:

Corporation Tax 2 Branch,
Business Taxes Policy and Legislation Division,
New Stamping Building,
Dublin Castle,
Dublin 2

This includes cases that, on establishment, would be managed by one of Revenue's Divisions.

However, where a taxpayer, which is currently dealt with by Large Corporates Division ("LCD") requires opinions/confirmations in relation to an activity to be carried on by a new subsidiary or a new branch any request should be made to the Case Manager in LCD dealing with the taxpayer's affairs.

An opinion will not be given where Revenue suspects that the transaction(s) may be, or may be part of, a scheme or arrangement for the purposes of tax avoidance.

An opinion given is based on the specific facts relevant to that case and its particular circumstances only and should not be relied upon for any other case.

It should be noted that all opinions/confirmations issued by Revenue are subject to a maximum validity period of 5 years, or such shorter period as may have been specified by Revenue when providing the opinion/confirmation. Further information on Revenue Opinions/Confirmations is available in TDM Part 37-00-41 on the Revenue website.

Note on the “Badges of Trade”

The Tax Acts do not set out any specific rules for distinguishing between trading and non-trading income. However, a fairly well established, set of guidelines have been laid down by the courts in various decided cases over the years. These are known as the “Badges of Trade” and were originally set out in the 1954 report of the UK Royal Commission on Taxation, these include: -

1. The subject matter of the sale.

Whilst almost any form of property can be acquired to be dealt in, those forms of property, such as commodities or manufactured articles, which are normally the subject of trading, are only very exceptionally the subject of investment. Again, property, which does not yield to its owner an income, or personal enjoyment merely by virtue of its ownership is more likely to have been acquired with the object of a deal than property that does.

2. The length of period of ownership.

Generally speaking, property meant to be dealt in, is realised within a short time after acquisition. But there are many exceptions from this as a universal rule.

3. The frequency of similar transactions.

If realisations of the same sort of property occur in succession over a period of years or there are several such realisations at about the same date a presumption arises that there has been dealing in respect of each.

4. Supplementary work.

If the property is worked up in any way during the ownership so as to bring it into a more marketable condition, or if any special exertions are made to find or attract purchasers, such as the opening of an office or large-scale advertising, there is some evidence of dealing. When there is an organised effort to obtain profit there is a source of taxable income. But if nothing at all is done, the suggestion tends the other way.

5. The circumstances that were responsible for the realisation.

There may be some explanation, such as a sudden emergency or opportunity calling for ready money that negates the idea that any plan of dealing prompted the original purchase.

6. Motive.

There are cases in which the purpose of the transaction and sale is clearly discernible. Motive is never irrelevant in any of these cases and can be inferred from surrounding circumstances in the absence of direct evidence of the seller's intentions.

It is, however, important to appreciate that the "whole picture" must be taken into account, so that the weight to be given to the various factors may vary according to circumstances. Furthermore, it is important to recognise that any given factor may be present to a greater or lesser degree, and that the absence (or presence) of any single factor is unlikely to be conclusive in its own right.
